Cardiac Conduction

The heart has the most sophisticated electrical control system and structure actually residing the heart in the heart itself. This electrical system is called the cardiac conduction system. It is made up of specialized tissues and cells producing the heart the cardiac impulses directly to the atria and ventricles, coordinating the heart. In the normal cardiac cycle, the left and right atria contract together first followed by the contraction of the ventricles together.

The cardiac conduction system is composed:

located in the heart itself parts:

1. The Sinoatrial Node

Also known as the pacemaker, this node usually generates the cardiac impulses that will control the heart rate.

2. The Atrioventricular Node (AVN) is located between the two ventricles that coordinates the heart rate and continues the electrical signal down into the ventricles.

3. The Purkinje Fibers

These fibers carry the electrical impulses to the ventricles, causing a contraction. The impulses start at the Sinoatrial Node, continue into the right atrial branch and left bundle branch, continue to Purkinje fibers, spread throughout the ventricles.

The Heartbeat

The sinoatrial (SA) node begins the contraction by sending an impulse through both atria, causing them to contract first and then the ventricles (AVN node). This SA node controls the impulse, sending a signal the bundle of the right atrial bundle branches, and into Purkinje fibers within the ventricles causing both ventricles to contract.

As the impulse moves through the heart, cardiac muscle cells contract, as the cells depolarize. Depolarization is caused by a flow of ions (sodium and potassium) across the cell membrane, as the cell is stimulated by the SA node. As the impulse moves through the heart, the impulse is passed, the cardiac cells contract to the SA node to coordinate impulses. This electrical depolarization and contraction allow the ions move back through the cell membrane, causing the cardiac muscle to relax. The SA node will create impulses from 100-110 electrical impulses per minute. Each cardiac impulse causes the heart to contract and relaxes the (ventricle cells). The electrical impulse causes the heart to contract and relax, followed by repolarization and relaxation, as a constant rate. The normal rhythm and rate is called the normal rhythm. The cardiac conduction system is also responsible for increasing or decreasing the number of electrical impulses depending on the amount of oxygen.
