

DIGESTIVE SYSTEM

INTRODUCTION

- The function of the digestive system is to prepare food for intake by body cells.
- Nutrients must be broken down by MECHANICAL AND CHEMICAL MEANS into molecules that are small enough to be absorbed into circulation.
- Within cells, the nutrients are used for energy and for rebuilding vital cell components.
- The digestive system also stores undigested waste materials and then eliminates them from the body.

DIGESTION

- It takes place in the DIGESTIVE TRACT PROPER, which extends from the mouth to the anus.
- PERISTALSIS, wave-like contractions of the organ walls, moves food through the digestive tract and also moves undigested waste material out of the body.
- Also contributing to digestion are several accessory organs that release secretions into the digestive tract.
- ENZYMES are needed throughout the digestive process.
- These compounds are organic catalysts that speed the rate of food's chemical breakdown.
- The names of most enzymes can be recognized by the ending -ase.

THE DIGESTIVE TRACT

- The digestive tract, also known as THE ALIMENTARY CANAL OR GASTROINTESTINAL (GI) TRACT, is essentially a long tube modified into separate organs with special functions.
- A large serous membrane, the PERITONEUM, covers the organs in the abdominal cavity, supporting and separating them.

THE MOUTH TO THE STOMACH

- Digestion begins in the mouth, also called the ORAL CAVITY. Here, food is chewed into small bits by the teeth.
- There are 32 teeth in a complete adult set, including incisors and canines to bite food and molars for grinding.

- The PALATE is the roof of the mouth; the anterior portion (hard palate) is formed by bone, and the posterior part (soft palate) is made of soft tissue.
- The fleshy UVULA, used in speech production, hangs from the soft palate.
- Dental hygienists help in care of the mouth and teeth.
- In the process of CHEWING, OR MASTICATION, the tongue, lips, cheeks, and palate also help to break up food and mix it with saliva, a secretion that moistens the food and begins starch digestion.
- The salivary glands secrete saliva into the mouth and are considered to be accessory digestive organs.

- Portions of moistened food are moved toward the pharynx (throat), where swallowing reflexes push them into the esophagus.
- PERISTALSIS moves the food through the esophagus and into the stomach.
- At its distal end, where it joins the stomach, the esophagus has muscle tissue that contracts to keep stomach contents from refluxing (flowing backward).
