

Guidelines on Use of Ice-Making Machine and Safe Handling of Ice

A public health document prepared by:
National Environment Agency

INTRODUCTION

Ice is commonly used at food establishments, however, many people do not realise that ice can be contaminated and can cause serious foodborne illnesses if not handled hygienically. Ice can be contaminated if it has been made using a dirty ice-making machine or handled with bare hands or contaminated utensils. Hence, food operators should take extra precautions to ensure that the ice served to consumers is free of harmful bacteria and safe for human consumption.

The set of guidelines presented in this document details the necessary measures that a food retail outlet should implement in order to prevent any foodborne illnesses caused by contaminated ice.

GUIDELINES

1) Handling of Ice

- a) All food handlers are required to be adequately trained to observe good hygiene practices when handling ice. Do not handle ice or any other food if you are feeling unwell with vomiting and/or diarrhoea.
- b) Wash hands thoroughly with soap and water, and dry hands before handling the ice.
