Decisions! Howard Flomberg, 2010-10-22 Decision making has been a black art for centuries In the 20th Century however methods and procedures for decision making have achieved some success thanks to management science techniques Making a decision is by its very nature a blend of qualitative and quantitative processes Qualitative analysis exists around scrutiny of observed or anticipated actions This research technique demands an analyst who can maintain an objective view of the situation However when we discuss quantitative analysis we think of numbers and quantities The mind wanders to counting statistics and probabilities an uncomfortable place for many This has been the standard domain for decision theory for decades Statisticians and the mathematically inclined consider qualitative analysis to be a stepchild In contrast a person who is involved in the decision making process often intuitively operates using qualitative analysis Qualitative analysis makes use of that person s experience expertise and professional opinions Decisions ,1980
