Fig. 2. $\Delta G_{\text{fold}}^{\text{fold}}(\text{kJ mol}^{-1})$ as a function of the electrostatic charges in the side chains. The arrows indicate the calculated electrostatic energy $\Delta G_{\text{fold}}^{\text{fold}}(\text{kJ mol}^{-1})$ for the corresponding residues in the folded state of the model proteins (see Table 1). The arrows indicate the change in electrostatic energy of the residues, showing the effect of a single side chain mutation on the fold.

Abstract: To explore the role of individual and family factors in parents' compliance with a family intervention, 100 parents of children with emotional/behavioral problems were interviewed. Results indicate that parents' compliance was related to their knowledge of the intervention, their perception of the intervention's value, and their perception of the intervention's feasibility.

- Strong linear relationships are only the visible consequences, and are not needed as a basis for inference
- Understanding the joint probability distributions and moments for X and Y is not sufficient for inference
- Gaussian theory focuses mainly on moment-based inference (the linear case)
- Gaussian copulas require only X and Y have marginal normal (linear) distributions (but are not available in our statistical toolbox) → A more general approach: the joint multiple regression and treatment can be assumed
- After standardizing the multiple linear model fully (regress Y on X and Z), we have:
 - One mean (regress)
 - Residual ϵ -modeling with linear and quadratic terms, known as least-squares (LSE) residual space (regression) term
- Quadratic regression required for X should not be linear
- Quadratic regression required for Z should be linear (if X and Z are correlated in the population)
