regression model and by playoff appearance odds through a logistic regression. The models were also run with a subset of data strictly including small market teams. After testing assumptions, running regressions, and selecting models, all models were found to show a relationship between team payroll and how many players take up half of that team's payroll with both winning percentage and playoff odds. Surprisingly, payroll was not determined to correlate with success when limiting the models to small market teams, leaving only the number of players to 50% of payroll as a predictor. Overall, it was found that most of a team's success is derived from factors outside of roster composition, and even in the top model, only roughly 27% of variation in winning percentage could be described by roster composition predictors.
