

CHAPTER 3

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. The basic objective of the accounting cycle is to transform accounting data into financial statements and other accounting reports. These outputs help individuals make better economic decisions.
2. The first three steps in the accounting cycle include the following:
 - a. Analyze transactions—verify the dates, amounts, and authenticity of the transactions and supporting business documents from which accounting entries are made.
 - b. Record the effects of transactions—record the nature and amounts of business exchanges with journal entries, usually in chronological order.
 - c. Summarize the effects of transactions.
 - (1) Post journal entries—classify and group similar transactions into common accounts.
 - (2) Determine account balances and prepare a trial balance—list the balances of all accounts to verify that total debits equal total credits.
3. Each time accounts are debited; other accounts have to be credited for the same amount. This is a major characteristic of a double-entry accounting system. The total debits must always equal the total credits. This procedure ensures that assets are always equal to liabilities plus equity.
4. Asset accounts are increased by debits and decreased by credits. Liability and equity accounts are increased by credits and decreased by debits. Thus, $A = L + E$ and debits equal credits in a double-entry accounting system.
5. Revenues provide resource inflows, and expenses represent resource outflows. The net result of revenues less expenses is income, which is reflected in equity. Revenue accounts are increased by credits and increase equity; expense accounts are increased by debits and reduce equity. Dividends also reduce equity, since they are distributions of earnings to the owners. Therefore, the dividends account is also increased by debits.

However, dividends do not enter into the determination of net income.

6. The dividends account is similar to expense accounts in that dividends and expenses reduce equity through the retained earnings account. Therefore, they have the same debit (increase) and credit (decrease) relationships. Dividends and expenses are different in that dividends are a distribution of earnings; they do not enter into the determination of net income, and therefore, dividends are not reported on the statement of comprehensive income. Expenses, on the other hand, are subtracted from revenues to determine net income; expenses are reported on the statement of comprehensive income.
7. Understanding the mechanics of accounting helps a businessperson understand the shorthand debit/credit language that is often used when talking about a company's accounts. In addition, people who understand the accounting cycle are better able to understand the flow of information through a business.
8. A journal (a book of original entry) provides a chronological record of all transactions of an entity. It shows the dates of the transactions, the amounts involved, and the accounts affected. Usually, an explanation of the transaction is also included.

A ledger is a "book of accounts" that lists each account and all entries made to it. The balance of an account can be found by examining the ledger.
