Research Methodology

4.1 Introduction:-

This chapter discusses the methodology used to conduct the research study as well as the issues related to the chosen research methodology when investigating the different factors affecting the adoption of E-Marketing by industrial and trading UK SBEs, the different forms, tools and levels of implementation of E-Marketing by these enterprises as well as the relationship between E-Marketing adoption and marketing performance of these SBEs. Through this discussion the steps that were taken to address the research design, the data collection and analysis methods used to conduct the research study will be illustrated. These issues are addressed in light of the basic research objectives and the relevant research questions discussed in chapter one and the research framework discussed in chapter seven.

Firstly it discusses some possible research designs and methodologies and provides a brief review of the literature of research methodologies, research strategies and research methods implemented in the fields of E-Marketing and SBEs. Based on this analysis, the research methodology for this study is justified in terms of its appropriateness and usefulness to achieve the basic research objectives. The research population, research sample, data collection methods, stages of collecting the data from the field, the procedures and problems encountered during each stage of the fieldwork as well as the actual data collected and methods of analysis are also explained in this chapter.

4.2 Research Methodologies and Strategies:-

According to Sarantakos (1998) research methodology is "the theory of methods" (Sarantakos, 1998; P: 465); it is the way in which one makes sense of the object of enquiry. Robson (2002) defines it as: "The theoretical, political and philosophical backgrounds to social research and their implications for research practice and for the use of particular research methods" (Robson, 2002; P: 549). According to Morvaridi (2005), the most prevalent methodologies in social sciences and humanities research methodology are quantitative and qualitative research (Morvaridi 2005; P: 2). Moreover, Sarantakos (2005) argues that social science can be conducted within a quantitative or qualitative context.
