CHAPTER OVERVIEW

Chapter 6 describes a major feature of management planning and control systems, budgets. The importance of satisfying customers and succeeding in the marketplace compels the use of a common accounting tool for planning and controlling, budgeting. As noted in the chapter, "Few businesses plan to fail, but many of those that flop, failed to plan." The chapter describes how budgeting is used in implementing plans developed through strategic planning, assisting managers in their planning function. Chapter 7 will describe how budgets aid managers in their control function. The wise and skillful administration of the budget is what gives budgets value because budgets, in themselves, are neither good nor bad.

The report models used in budgeting are familiar, as they are the basic financial statements. The statements are approached from a different perspective, as typically projected sales are the starting point for preparing a budget. In costing systems studied in the previous two chapters, sales are the result of operations rather than the beginning consideration. Preparation of an operating budget is illustrated. Cash budgeting, a part of financial budgeting, is illustrated in the appendix to the chapter.

The theme of continuous improvement is featured through a description of kaizen budgeting. For organizations that use activity-based costing and activity-based management, activity-based budgeting works back through the activity-based costing system using the same defined activities and relationships.

Responsibility accounting is introduced as a means of coordinating the efforts of all employees in an organization to attain the goals described in the master budget. The notion of controllability is addressed. The chapter closes with a crucial aspect of budgeting – the human factor. The importance of the role of people in the budgeting process is acknowledged throughout the chapter.
