Interest aroused in the past by Neusiedlersee located in what was earlier the western part of Hungary was mainly due to the enormous fluctuations in water level and the consequent threat to the livelihood of the local population who lived chiefly from stock farming Practically no tourism touched the area until 1920 about a century later than Schubert's visit to the Salzkammergut lake district the traditional resort area in Upper Austria Probably because of its small popularity there is almost no documentation in the form of engravings or paintings One of the exceptions is an oil painting by Schnorr Carolsfeld from about 1820 It is obvious that there was no Phragmites at the time he painted the view near Neusiedl When the shallow Neusiedlersee was discovered by tourists it began to attract scientific interest although some earlier work by mineralogists geographers and hydrographers does exist But it was only after the Second World War that this interest could be intensified the lake now being an alkaline turbid body of water confined by the vast areas of Phragmites which had come into existence after the lake last dried out in 1868 Scientific work gained considerable impetus from international activities such as the International Biological Programme International Hydrological Decade and Man and Biosphere the results of which will be included in this volume But in spite of all such efforts Neusiedlersee will undoubtedly remain in many respects a mystery
