Chapter - 3

Reproduction in Animals

Reproduction is an important characteristic of all living beings like plants, animals also reproduce. They produce young ones of their own kind to maintain and continue their race. For example, dogs, cats and human beings, all produce offspring of their own kind.

The process by which living beings give birth to their young ones of their own kind to maintain and continue their species is called reproduction. It is a universal characteristic essential for continuity and survival of species.

In animals, reproduction can occur in two primary ways — asexual and sexual.

ASEXUAL REPRODUCTION

In asexual reproduction, only one individual produces offspring that are genetically identical to itself. It does not involve the fusion of sex cells (gametes). Asexual reproduction is common in lower organisms, like amoeba, hydra and starfish. The common methods of asexual reproduction include:

Fission

In this method of asexual reproduction, a single-celled organism divides into two daughter cells. The cell divides equally along with the equal division of its cytoplasm and the nucleus. This type of division is mostly seen in protozoans like amoeba and paramecium. When a cell divides into two daughter cells, the division is called binary fission. During unfavourable conditions, some organisms develop a thick, protective cover called cyst around themselves. Inside the cyst, the cell divide rapidly along with the division of the nucleus. When the conditions become favourable, the cyst ruptures and releases numerous daughter cells. This is called multiple fission. Plasmodium, vector of malaria, divides by multiple fission.
