The canopy is home to unique flora and fauna not found in other layers of a forest. Trees in the canopy are able to photosynthesize very rapidly thanks to the large amount of light so it supports the widest diversity of plant as well as animal life in most rainforests. This book presents a wide variety of topics on the ecosystem in forest canopies. Included is a study on light distribution patterns and how it affects the daily photosynthesis of herbaceous vegetation. Recent progress concerns and future directions in simulations of vegetation processes are presented as well in the terrestrial biosphere model that is coupled to a climate system model.
