Life on and in the ice

Massive sheets of sea ice, 2–3 metres thick, are a critical component of the Arctic Archipelago, an extensive marine biome including the Arctic Ocean and Beaufort Sea. Typically, the extent of these sheets varies seasonally from 7 km² in the summer to 14 million km² in the winter (the entire country of Canada is just under 10 million km²). At their largest, parts of the sheets become continuous with glaciers extending from the mountains to the sea.

Many iconic marine mammals depend on the ice for their livelihood (Figure 52.1). Beluga whales and seals take refuge in polynyas, spots where warmer water upwells and keeps the surface from freezing. These openings are vital hunting grounds where polar bears obtain the majority of the annual caloric intake.

The ice is also very important for much smaller organisms. Shown to the left are microscopic algae that live within the ice. As the seawater freezes and ice crystals coalesce, tiny networks of water-filled spaces are formed. The briny water in these channels does not freeze because the salt concentration is even higher than seawater. These briny networks in the underside of the ice are home to a diverse micro community including photosynthetic diatoms, heterotrophic protists, and bacteria. The algal species account for up to one-quarter of the Arctic Archipelago's productivity during the summer months.

Sea ice microcommunity

At the Freshwater Institute, Fisheries and Oceans Canada in Winnipeg*, Dr. Andrea Niemi has been studying this unique micro community with particular interest in how the community changes from summer to winter. In the summer, these algae contribute significantly and account for about 20% of the total productivity. During the darker winter months there is not enough light to support photosynthesis in these communities and overall productivity decreases. Consequently, there is less organic carbon available and the community shrinks while maintaining the same relative abundance of species. The key algal species that bloom in the spring are present all winter. However, they are in a dormant state similar to the other community members.

Climate change is severely threatening the Arctic Archipelago biome. The extent of the sea ice is diminishing. In September 2018, the extent was the sixth lowest (as measured by
