

CHAPTER 53: COMMUNITY ECOLOGY

INTERACTIVE QUESTIONS

53.1 The realized niche of species I is smaller than its fundamental niche when it is in competition with species II. In these trees, species II's fundamental and realized niches are the same.

- 53.2 a. Batesian mimicry
b. Mullerian mimicry

- 53.3 a. mutualism: mycorrhizae, flowering plants and pollinators, ants on acacia trees, cellulose-digesting microorganisms in termites and ruminants
b. commensalism: cattle egrets and cattle that flush insects (although cattle may benefit when ectoparasites are eaten or be harmed if the birds make them more obvious to predators)
c. competition: competition of barnacle species
d. predation: animal predators killing prey
e. herbivory: herbivores eating parts of plants
f. parasitism: endo- and ectoparasites feed in or on host
g. disease: pathogens may kill host

53.4 energetic hypothesis

53.5 The +/- cascade that would be needed to end with a decrease in algae would require an increase in zooplankton, which would require a decrease in primary predators caused by an increase in top predators. More top predators could be added to the lake or primary predators could be removed.

- 53.6 a. Soil nitrogen levels begin quite low, but rise due to the symbiotic nitrogen-fixing bacteria of alder.
b. The soil pH changes from about 7.0 to 4.0 as the acid spruce leaves decompose.

53.7 More interspecific interactions would have had time to develop, and this longer span of evolutionary time would allow for more speciation events to have occurred.

- 53.8 a. immigration – large island
b. immigration – small island
c. extinction – small island
d. extinction – large island

The small island equilibrium number is projected down from the intersection of lines b and c. The large island number is projected down the intersection of a and d.

53.8 the individualistic hypothesis: each species appears to have an independent distribution along environmental gradients
