Chemical Reactions

A chemical reaction is when two or more things combine to make something new. This can happen in your kitchen, in a factory, or even in your own body!

Let's think about an example of a chemical reaction that you might see in your kitchen. If you mix together baking soda and vinegar, you'll see bubbles form. This is because the baking soda and vinegar are reacting to make a new substance called carbon dioxide. Carbon dioxide is the same gas that makes soda bubbly and is also the same gas that we breathe out when we exhale!

Another example of a chemical reaction is when iron rusts. Rusting is a type of chemical reaction that happens when iron is exposed to water and oxygen. Iron is a type of metal, and when it rusts, it turns red and flaky. Rust is actually a new substance that forms when the iron reacts with water and oxygen.

Chemical reactions also happen in our bodies. For example, when you eat food, your body breaks down the food into smaller parts using chemical reactions. This helps your body get the energy it needs to grow and do things like run and play.

Chemical reactions can also happen in factories. Factories use chemical reactions to make things like medicine, candy, and plastic. These chemical reactions can be very complex and require special tools and equipment to do safely.

Overall, chemical reactions happen all around us! They can be big or small, simple or complex, but they always make something
