
41 Industrial Microbiology

CHAPTER OVERVIEW

Industrial microbiology exploits the range of genetic resources and natural products generated by microorganisms to produce compounds with industrial or medical application. Genetically engineered microorganisms can be used to increase the efficiency of the industrial processes and to produce new or modified products. Major products of industrial microbiology is discussed, including agricultural biotechnology and microbial energy conversion.

CHAPTER OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

- discuss the sources of microorganisms for use in industrial microbiology and biotechnology
- discuss the genetic manipulation of microorganisms to construct strains that better meet the needs of an industrial or biotechnological process
- describe the design or manipulation of environments in which desired processes will be carried out
- discuss the management of growth characteristics to produce the desired product
- list the major products or uses of industrial microbiology and biotechnology
- discuss the processes and value of microbial energy conversions
- discuss the use of microorganisms in manufacturing nanotechnology, biosensors, and biopesticides

CHAPTER OUTLINE

- I. Microorganisms for Industrial Microbiology
 - A. Finding microorganisms in nature—major sources of microorganisms for use in industrial processes are soil, water, and spoiled bread and fruit; only a minor portion of microbial species in most environments have been identified and cultured
 - B. Genetic manipulation of microorganisms
 1. Mutagenesis—cultures can be improved by mutagenesis with chemical agents and UV light
 2. Protoplast fusion—involves removal of cell walls (to create protoplasts), mixing two different solutions of protoplasts, and growth in selective media
 3. Transfer of genetic information between different organisms—functional genes are cloned and inserted into new hosts where heterologous gene expression enables the production of specific proteins and products
 4. Modification of gene expression—modification of regulatory molecules can increase gene expression
 5. Directed evolution
 - a. Construction of production strains by specifically targeting genes of interest for mutagenesis
 - b. Site-directed mutagenesis changes nucleotide sequences using a PCR-based approach that uses methylation patterns to protect mutated gene copies; only a few nucleotides are changed at a time
 - c. Combinatorial biosynthesis uses knowledge of pathways to create altered nonprotein products (e.g., polyketide antibiotics)
 - d. Systematic evolution of ligands by exponential enrichment (SELEX) creates large populations of engineered RNA molecules (aptamers) for use in therapies
