

Digestive System

Purpose:

The basic components that every cell requires to survive are called Macromolecules:

- Carbohydrates: used for the immediate production of energy (sugar)
- Lipids: are used as long-term energy sources and a vital components of cell membranes (fats)
- Amino Acids: are used to construct new organelles (proteins)
- Nucleic Acids: are used to construct new DNA

Although macromolecules are found in our food, they are often found in large and complex structures that our cells can not utilize. The role of the digestive system is to:

- break down macromolecules down into structures that our cells use (digestion)
- absorb the digested macromolecules into the blood stream so it can be distributed through the body

Digestion:

Digestion can either be mechanical and chemical

→ Mechanical digestion is the physical breakdown of food into smaller pieces. Mechanical digestion starts in the mouth. Digestion in the stomach is done by breaking macromolecules into structures that our cells can utilize.

→ Chemical digestion is chemical reactions that break macromolecules into smaller forms that the cells can utilize. This is often aided by chemical proteins called enzymes. Enzymes speed up the rate that chemical digestion occurs.
