A Christmas Orange

by Fred C. Lemon

Jake was the resident of an orphan's home, one of ten children supported by what contributions the home could secure on a continuous struggle. There was very little to eat. It was seldom very warm in the wintertime, for fuel was expensive. But at Christmastime there always seemed to be a little more to eat, and the home seemed a little warmer, and it was time for more than the usual enjoyment; but more than that there was the orange. At Christmas each child received an orange. It was the only time of year that such a rare item was provided, and it was coveted by each child like no other thing they ever possessed. They could save it for several days, admiring it, feeling it, loving it, and contemplating the moment when they would eat it. Truly it was the "pièce de résistance" to the Christmastide, and for the year, for many would wait until New Year's Day or later to eat it. Oftentimes it would start to dry out before they would eat it, wanting to save it and to treasure it as long as they could.

This Christmas day Jake had offended the rules of authority of the home in some manner, and his punishment was loss of the orange privilege. After a year of waiting for the rare occasion and the most desired of all rewards, it was to be denied. Plaintiff pleading was to no avail. Although the offense was rather minor, it was an infraction of such rules that must govern in regulated society. Jake spent Christmas Day empty and alone. It even seemed the other children didn't want to associate with a person who didn't have an orange.

Nighttime arrived, and this was the worst of all. Jake could not sleep. There was no love in the world, there was no forgiving; and certainly no one to comfort the child to suffer so much. Still, he sobbed for the future.
