Observe and Infer

Growing Mold Spores Any mold spore that arrives in a favorable place can germinate and produce hyphae. Can you identify a condition necessary for the growth of bread mold spores?

Procedure

- 1 Place two slices of freshly baked bakery bread on a plate. Sprinkle some water on one slice to moisten its surface. Leave both slices uncovered for several hours.
- 2 Sprinkle a little more water on the moistened slice, and place both slices in their own plastic, self-seal bags. Trap air in each bag so that the plastic does not touch the bread's surface. Then seal the bags and place them in a darkened area at room temperature.
- 3 After five days, remove the bags and look for mold.
- 4 Remove a small piece of mold with a forceps, place it on a slide in a drop of water, and add a coverslip. Observe the mold under a microscope's low power and high power. CAUTION: Use caution when working with a microscope, glass slides, and coverslips. Wash your hands with soap and water after working with mold. Dispose of the mold as your teacher directs.

Analysis

1. Observe and Infer Did you observe mold growth on the moistened bread? On the dry bread? How does this experiment demonstrate that there are mold spores in your classroom?
2. Draw Conclusions What conclusions can you draw about the conditions necessary for the growth of a bread mold?

puffball, rust, or ringworm. Many species grow best in moist environments at warm temperatures between 20°C and 30°C. You are, however, probably familiar with molds that grow at much lower temperatures on left-over foods in your refrigerator.

Fungi used to be classified in the plant kingdom because, like plants, many fungi grow anchored in soil and have cell walls. However, as biologists learned more about fungi, they realized that fungi belong in their own kingdom.

The structure of fungi

Although there are a few unicellular types of fungi, such as yeasts, most fungi are multicellular. The basic structural units of multicellular fungi are their threadlike filaments called hyphae (HI fee) (singular, hypha), which develop from fungal spores, as shown in Figure 20.2. Hyphae elongate at their tips and branch extensively to form a network of filaments called a mycelium (mi SEE lee um). There are different types of hyphae in a mycelium. Some anchor the fungus, some invade the food source, and others form fungal reproductive structures. Use the MiniLab on this page to observe the hyphae of some bread mold you grow.
