

Child Safety Online

Some observations from Childnet International to the COPA Commission

The Commission has collected a huge amount of evidence from many organisations within the USA. This note provides a different perspective from Childnet International, a not for profit group based in the UK but working around the world with the mission of helping make the Internet a great place for children (see Annex 1 for a description of Childnet's functions and recent activities).

Childnet was disappointed that it was unable to accept the Commission's invitation to provide oral evidence because of scheduling conflicts. At this stage of the Commission's activities it seemed best to submit a summary of the key lessons Childnet has learned from its work. If the opportunity arose to expand on this submission through oral evidence later in the year, Childnet would be very willing to do this.

The Internet provides tremendous opportunities for children to discover, connect and create

In the few short years that the Internet has been widely available it has made an enormous impact on children's lives. (One testimony to this is found in the amazing quality and richness of the winners of the annual Cable and Wireless Childnet International Awards contest see www.childnet-int.org/awards.)

The Digital Divide is a very significant issue both within the USA and around the world

There is a near universal acceptance around the world that online access is crucial for children's learning and development of essential future work skills. But the opportunity for access, at school and at home, is very unevenly spread. There are more telephone lines in Tokyo, Japan than the whole of Africa. Strategies to overcome digital exclusion (whether of poverty, isolation, physical handicap, language, ethnic group or culture) are vital to benefit the world's children.

3

The dangers children face online are real and should be neither sensationalised nor minimised

Childnet describes the main dangers as arising from issues of:

CONTENT - accessing inappropriate content including pornography, child pornography, racist/hate and violent sites.

CONTACT - being contacted through chat rooms and e-mail by those who would seek to harm or lure them.

COMMERCIAL - the blur between much content and advertising, direct marketing to children, collection of information violating privacy.
