

Chapter 15 Questions

1.

Consider the four clinical case studies.

Case A

The patient develops vomiting and diarrhea shortly after milk ingestion. The physician administers a lactose tolerance test. (After the patient ingests a standard amount of lactose, the physician measures the glucose and galactose concentrations in his blood plasma at intervals. In individuals with normal carbohydrate metabolism, the levels increase to a maximum in about 1 hour, then decline.) The patient's blood glucose and galactose concentrations do not increase during the test.

Case B

The patient develops vomiting and diarrhea after ingestion of milk. Blood tests show a low concentration of glucose but a much higher than normal concentration of reducing sugars. The urine tests positive for galactose.

Case C

The patient complains of painful muscle cramps when performing strenuous physical exercise but has no other symptoms. A muscle biopsy indicates a muscle glycogen concentration that is much higher than normal.

Case D

The patient is lethargic, her liver is enlarged, and a biopsy of the liver shows large amounts of excess glycogen. She also has a lower than normal blood glucose level.
