

Chapter 3—Ethics

- Being an ethical practitioners is far more complex than a set of rules.
  - Mandatory Ethics—involves a level of ethical functioning at the minimum level of professional practice
  - Aspirational Ethics— focuses on doing what is in the best interests of clients, involves the highest standards of thinking and conduct. Entails understanding the spirit of the code and the principles on which the code is based.
    - Fear-based ethics does not constitute sound ethical practice. Ethics is more than a list of things to avoid for fear of punishment. Strive to work toward concern-based ethics, and think about how you can become the best practitioner possible
  - Positive Ethics—approach taken by practitioners who want to do their best for clients rather than simply meet minimum standards to stay out of trouble
- Ethically, it is essential that we become aware of our own needs, areas of unfinished business, potential personal problems, and especially our sources of countertransference.
- “Whose needs are being met in this relationship, my client’s or my own?” It takes considerable professional maturity to make an honest appraisal of how your behavior affects your clients. It is not unethical for us to meet our personal needs through our professional work, but it is essential that these needs be kept in perspective.
- An ethical problem exists when we meet our needs, in either obvious or subtle ways, at the expense of our clients’ needs.
- If we are aware of our personal problems and are willing to work through them, there is less chance that we will project them onto clients. If certain problem areas surface and old conflicts become reactivated, we have an ethical obligation to do whatever it takes to avoid harming our clients.
- Other, less obviously harmful personal needs that can get in the way of creating growth-producing relationships, such as the need for control and power; the inordinate need to be nurturing; the need to change others in the direction of our own values; the need for feeling adequate, particularly when it becomes overly important that the client confirm our competence; and the need to be respected and appreciated.
- Professionals are expected to exercise prudent judgment when it comes to interpreting and applying ethical principles to specific situations. Although you are responsible for making ethical decisions, you do not have to do so alone.
- Consult with colleagues, keep yourself informed about laws affecting your practice, keep up to date in your specialty field, stay abreast of developments in ethical practice, reflect on the impact your values have on your practice, and be willing to engage in honest self-examination.
- Be aware of the consequences of practicing in ways that are not sanctioned by organizations of which you are a member or the state in which you are licensed to practice.
- Professional codes of ethics serve a number of purposes
  - Educate counseling practitioners and the general public about the responsibilities of the profession
  - Provide a basis for accountability, and protect clients from unethical practices
  - Ethics codes provide a basis for reflecting on and improving your professional practice***
- Self-monitoring is a better route for professionals to take than being policed by an outside agency
- Being an ethical practitioner involves far more than following a list of rules. One of the best ways to prevent being sued for malpractice is to demonstrate respect for clients, keep client welfare as a central concern, and practice within the framework of professional codes.
- Ethics codes are best used as guidelines to formulate sound reasoning and serve practitioners in making the best judgments possible.
- To help you think through ethical problems when using these principles:
  - Identify the problem or dilemma. Gather information that will shed light on the nature of the problem. This will help you decide whether the problem is mainly ethical, legal, professional, clinical, or moral.
