The Qatar government has put in new regulations to bring reforms in the labor system focusing on protecting workers' rights, but it is still just on paper unless the government really enforces this to bring abusive employers to book.

Ninety-four percent of the workforce in Qatar comprises migrants, contributing to the country the biggest ratio of migrants to citizens in the world. Within the remaining period until the hosting of the 2022 FIFA World Cup, the country may take up an additional one million construction workers to make the infrastructure improvements Qatar put forward in its World Cup-bidding bid. FIFA also pledged to raise the issue of workers' rights with the Qatar government.

Effect of the reforms on Qatar's labor laws on the job market

The Qatar government through the Shura Council set in motion labor reforms following condemnation of its restrictive labor laws (the Kafala system) in the run-up to hosting the 2022 FIFA World Cup in 2025. The new laws took effect in December 2024, and all stakeholders have welcomed them.

These changes are going to have a significant effect on the country's job market. Since the new laws give employees a choice to easily change employers, more talented job seekers may start streaming into Qatar. The influx of these job seekers would, in turn, enhance business entities, thus benefiting the economy.

Skilled expatriates who had left Qatar would return since the new laws also got rid of the previous two-year maximum working period requirement for foreigners. The return of such workers is beneficial to employers because they already know and understand the working environment in Qatar, thus saving the time required to adapt to the culture of the country.

The new law requires that salaries get paid through the Wage Protection System, meaning that employers cannot withhold salaries for any reason at all. Moreover, the Qatar Labor Ministry would handle the employment of expatriates directly. This change would make Qatar an attractive employment destination for many foreigners especially those from Asia.

Under the new law, workers can work for a maximum of 48 hours per week without overtime pay, except during Ramadan when the limit reduces to 36 hours. Overtime hours are limited to
