"The Corrections" by Jonathan Franzen: Character Analysis Anonym, 2013 Studienarbeit aus dem Jahr 2008 im Fachbereich Anglistik / Literatur, Note 2, Sprache Deutsch. Abstract: When I finished reading The Corrections by Jonathan Franzen, I wanted to know if there is a general theme or problem that connects the Lambert siblings. The title of the book itself has a negative connotation and makes it clear from the start that somebody already did something wrong. By reading the title, one can already anticipate that there is something wrong. However, it is not as Joseph Epstein suggested that the characters in the novel are because of their problems at various times on some sort of correction pill. Epstein (2002) The corrections or problems that the characters are trying to solve by using medical treatment come with their own lives and experiences. However, the title indirectly presupposes that the hills that need to be overcome in their lives cannot be flattened by taking corrections. Furthermore, the fictional place where the Lambert house is situated, St. Jude, saint of hopeless cases, gives further evidence that the characters do not succeed with their plans. Yet, besides these references that are detrimental to the tension of the narrative, the question that needs to be settled and on which the whole tension of the novel is based on: what did the characters do wrong and why did they fail? The characters must have faced some problems or obstacles that needed to be overcome. Certainly, as the title already indicates, they failed or did something wrong, even though their problems might have been different.

Therefore I would like to examine if there are connections between the reasons of their failures and the mistakes they have done Although it has been seven years since The Corrections has been published and three years it has been included in the Time magazine's list of the 100 best English language novels not much has been written about it yet Thus I mainly used the novel itself for my researches since most of the second
