Stationary Engineer License

A City of Chicago stationary engineer license is required for an individual to use, manage, or operate most steam and hot water boilers or to take charge of, manage, or operate a steam plant within the City of Chicago. Licensed stationary engineers must follow the ordinances, laws, and industry standards which provide for the safe operation of the equipment they are licensed to operate.

Stationary engineer licenses are issued by the Department of Buildings.

Frequently Asked Questions

When is a stationary engineer license required?

A stationary engineer license is required before any individual uses, manages, or operates:

- A steam engine or steam boiler with an output capacity in excess of 50 boiler horsepower or intended for operation at a pressure in excess of 10 psig.
- A hot water boiler intended for operation at a pressure in excess of 160 psi or temperature in excess of 250°F (121°C).

This does not apply to locomotive engines or boilers.

A stationary engineer license is also required before any individual takes charge of, manages, or operates a steam plant within the City of Chicago. A steam plant is a system that is connected to a regulated engine or boiler and used to generate or distribute steam or hot water for space heating or industrial processes.

If you own or control regulated equipment or a steam plant, it is illegal to authorize or allow anyone other than a licensed stationary engineer to use, manage, or operate it.
