

Requirements of engineering drawings

- Engineering drawings should be unambiguous and clear.
- The drawing must be complete.
- The drawing must be suitable for duplication
- Drawings must be language-independent.
- Drawings need to conform to standards.

Types of views in engineering drawings

Engineering drawings often utilize different types of views to contribute to the understanding of a design. Here are various types of views used in engineering drawings.

Isometric view

Isometric drawings show parts as three-dimensional. Vertical lines stay vertical (compared to the front view) and parallel lines are shown at an angle, usually 30 degrees. In an isometric drawing, the object appears as if it is being viewed from above from one corner

The lines that are vertical and parallel are in their true length. This means you can use a ruler and the scaling of the drawing to measure the length.

Orthographic view

An orthographic view represents a 3-D object using several two-dimensional views of the object. Standard practice calls for three orthographic views, a front, top and side view. This kind of representation allows for avoiding any kind of distortion of lengths.

Different areas of the world use different angle projections to show orthographic views. You can tell which angle projection is used by the symbol shown on the drawing.

- First-angle projection: The International Organization for Standardization (ISO) calls for this kind of projection.
- Third-angle projection: The American National Standards Institute (ANSI) calls for this kind of projection and is the accepted method in the United States.
