

Globe: Latitudes and Longitudes

Globe

The Earth is nearly a sphere. The shape of the Earth is neither round nor a perfect sphere because its surface flattens at the North Pole and South Pole and bulges at the equator. If we cut earth into two equal halves from any of the meridians (cross section through the poles), the diameter measured will be slightly less than the diameter measured by cutting the Earth at the equator into two. Hence, we can say that the shape of the Earth is Oblate Spheroid instead of round or perfect sphere. The poles are the two reference points on the surface of the Earth, and an imaginary tilted line joining the two poles which passes through the centre of the Earth is known as axis. The Earth moves around its axis. In order to locate a particular place on the surface of the Earth, and pre-empt confusion regarding the location, distance and time, a network of imaginary lines are drawn on a map or globe with reference to specific measurement.
