

Introduction to Reinforcement and Systemic Machine Learning

1.1 INTRODUCTION

The expectations from intelligent systems are increasing day by day. What an intelligent system was supposed to do a decade ago is now expected from an ordinary system. Whether it is a washing machine or a health care system, we expect it to be more and more intelligent and demonstrate that behavior while solving complex as well as day-to-day problems. The applications are not limited to a particular domain and are literally distributed across all domains. Hence domain-specific intelligence is fine but the user has become demanding, and a true intelligent and problem-solving system irrespective of domains has become a necessary goal. We want the systems to drive cars, play games, train players, retrieve information, and help even in complex medical diagnosis. All these applications are beyond the scope of isolated systems and traditional preprogrammed learning. These activities need dynamic intelligence. Dynamic intelligence can be exhibited through learning not only based on available knowledge but also based on the exploration of knowledge through interactions with the environment. The use of existing knowledge, learning based on dynamic facts, and acting in the best way in complex scenarios are some of the expected features of intelligent systems.

The learning has many facets. Right from simple memorization of facts to complex inference are some examples of learning. But at any point of time, learning is a holistic activity and takes place around the objective of better decision-making. Learning results from data storing, sorting, mapping, and classification. Still one of the most important aspects of intelligence is learning. In most of the cases we expect learning to be a more goal-centric activity. Learning results from an inputs from an experienced person, one's own experience, and inference based on experiences or past learning. So there are three ways of learning:

- Learning based on expert inputs (supervised learning)
