

Chapter 22. The Respiratory System (Check Your Understanding)

22.1 The upper respiratory system warms, humidifies, and filters air

1. Air moving from the nose to the larynx passes by a number of structures. List (in order) as many of these structures as you can.
2. Name the two types of mucous membrane found in the nasal cavity.
3. DRAW Create a summary table to help you study the pharynx by comparing and contrasting its three parts. For each part, identify what it conducts (air, food, or both), the type of epithelium found there, and the associated tonsils.

22.2 The lower respiratory system consists of conducting and respiratory zone structures

4. Which structure seals the larynx when we swallow?
5. Which structural features of the trachea allow it to expand and contract, yet keep it from collapsing?
6. What features of the alveoli and their respiratory membranes suit them to their function of exchanging gases by diffusion?
7. APPLY A 3-year-old boy is brought to the emergency department after aspirating (inhaling) a peanut. Bronchoscopy confirms the suspicion that the peanut is lodged in a bronchus and then it is successfully extracted. Which main bronchus was the peanut most likely to be in? Why?

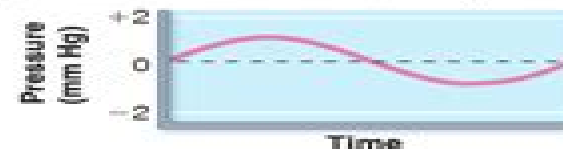

22.3 Each multilobed lung occupies its own pleural cavity

8. The lungs are perfused by two different circulations. Name these circulations and indicate their roles in the lungs.

9. MAKE CONNECTIONS Where is angiotensin converting enzyme found and why is this a good location for this enzyme? Name the blood pressure-increasing hormone cascade (described in Chapter 19) to which this enzyme belongs.

22.4 Volume changes cause pressure changes, which cause air to move

10. What is the driving force for pulmonary ventilation?
11. What causes the partial vacuum (negative pressure) inside the pleural cavity? What happens to a lung if air enters the pleural cavity? What is the clinical name for this condition?
12. Premature infants often lack adequate surfactant. How does this affect their ability to breathe?
13. DRAW On the graph of intrapulmonary pressure below, label the periods of inspiration and expiration, and all of the points where air flow is zero. Explain.
