KNOWLEDGE CHECK 23-1

- What are some important developmental considerations when providing a safe environment for a preschool child?

Answer:

The preschooler is less prone to falls than the toddler, but other types of injuries increase because preschooler play includes more outside activities. Supervision of outside play, such as on playground equipment, is important. Safety must be stressed when playing near streets.

- What is the main cause of injuries during the adolescent period?

Answer:

Motor vehicle accidents are the most common cause of serious and fatal accidents during adolescence, especially if alcohol or drug use is involved.

- What are some ways that the aging process makes the older adult more prone to injury?

Answer:

The aging process can result in physiological changes that can create changes in strength and gait stability. Some adults experience sensory losses, particularly hearing and vision.

- Based on your theoretical knowledge and the scant patient data you have, why do you think Teresa's toddler (Meet Your Patients, in your textbook) is at risk for accidents? What about Teresa's grandmother?

Answer:

The toddler and grandmother have the following risks for accidents:

- Toddler. You have the theoretical knowledge that toddlers are typically active and curious and that their motor skills advance faster than their judgment and ability to recognize danger. You have the data that Teresa's toddler is typical in this respect: "into everything." You also have Teresa's statement that it is becoming difficult for her to provide enough supervision for the toddler.

- Grandmother. You have the theoretical knowledge that older adults often have motor and sensory losses that increase their risk for accidents. You have the patient data that Teresa's grandmother has a mobility problem (recovering from hip fracture) and that she is afraid of falling.
