

America's Second War for Independence – The War of 1812 DBQ
US History/Napp

Name: _____

Historical Context:

"John Adam's successor Thomas Jefferson (elected in 1800) also faced international crises during his presidency. Pirate ships off the coast of North Africa had attacked American vessels, and Jefferson refused their increased demands for tribute. He sent a small fleet to blockade the Barbary States in North Africa and eventually won a peace settlement that protected American shipping.

Unfortunately, Jefferson's attempts to protect Americans' rights to trade with Europe as a neutral country were not as successful. Both France and England were seizing American ships to prevent supplies from reaching the European ports. When England fired upon the American warship Chesapeake, killing and injuring 21 people, Americans demanded a declaration of war. Instead, Jefferson persuaded Congress to pass the Embargo Act of 1807, which forbade American ships from leaving and foreign ships from entering any U.S. port. The act had disastrous results for the American economy and was repealed three days before Jefferson left office. Jefferson's hand-picked successor, James Madison, easily won the election of 1808. Madison had no better luck in stopping the attacks against American shipping. More Republicans began to call for war. The western farmers wanted war because they still blamed Britain for their problems with some American Indian tribes, who continued to block their westward expansion.

The 'War Hawks,' as Congressman Henry Clay of Kentucky, Congressman John Calhoun of South Carolina, and their supporters were called, cited the British-Indian alliances as cause for war. However, those New Englanders who had been hurt by the seizure of American ships were against the war. They knew that in the long run the economic success of New England was closely tied to good relations with Great Britain. New Englanders suspected that those calling for war were really more interested in expanding United States territory by conquering Canada than they were in protecting American freedom of the seas. Eventually the War Hawks won out, and war was declared on June 18, 1812.

After two years of fighting it was not clear which side was winning. The British had managed to burn some public buildings in Washington, D.C. The Americans had successfully resisted the British shelling of Fort Mchenry – the battle that inspired Francis Scott Key to write the Star Spangled Banner.

By the end of 1814, both sides were weary of a war that seemed to be going nowhere. British and American representatives agreed to hold peace talks in Belgium. On Christmas Eve, 1814, the Treaty of Ghent ended the fighting, but it did not resolve the issues that had led to war. It did not address the British violation of neutral rights on the high seas and the impressment of American seamen. The treaty simply provided for the return of all occupied territory, restoring the prewar boundaries between Canada and the United States. A joint commission was later to settle disputed land claims."
