

Chapter #2: The Research Enterprise in Psychology

Research Methods:

- Independent and Dependent Variables: Experimental
 - Independent: What investigator is interested in studying (Ex. noise, level of drug)
 - Dependent: Measured by researcher and influenced by independent variable (Ex. Learning, # of symptoms)

3 Main Approaches:

1. Experimental Methods:
 - Is there a "cause and effect" relationship?
2. Correlational Studies:
 - Is there a relationship between/among variables?
3. Descriptive Research:
 - Describe behaviour of organisms in natural settings
 - Case studies; naturalistic observation; surveys; interviews (not changing anything)

QUIZ: Compare and contrast different approaches of research

Experiments: Three Essential Characteristics

1. Researcher manipulate one variable
4. Researcher measures whether this variable produces changes in another variable
5. Researcher attempts to control for other factors that might influence results

Experimental Research:

2 Groups of Participants: Experimental Group (receives treatment) & Control Group (not exposed to treatment)

- Treatment:
 - Independent Variable (IV): Manipulated, experimental factor
 - Dependent Variable (DV): Factor that is measured

Sampling: Experimental

Population:

- All individuals about whom we are interested in drawing a conclusion (Ex. 8 year old boys, people who've been bullied)

Sample:

- Subset of individuals drawn from a larger population of interest (impossible to interview the world, therefore, use a small group to make a conclusion for the entire population)

Representative Sample:

- Reflects the important characteristics of the population (ethnicity)
- The same amount of people from each group

Random Sample:

- All individuals have an equal likelihood of being assigned to control or experimental group

Descriptive Research:

- Observation:
