

Bony Fish Dissection

Abstract

Osteichthyes (from Greek, osteon 'bone' + ichthys 'fish') are a taxonomic grouping of bony fishes. This group includes ray-finned fishes (class: Actinopterygii) and lobe-finned fishes (class: Sarcopterygii). This highly diverse group of fishes, which contains almost all fish species, is the most diverse group of vertebrates today. Osteichthyes differ from chondrichthyes by (in most cases) possessing a bony skeleton, a swim bladder, scales (ctenoid, cycloid, or ganoid scales), and external fertilization.

Saint Catherine de la Croix (Diamond Plateau)

Although only eight sarcopterygian fish species exist today, they are interesting because scientists believe they are the likely descendants of the fishes that gave rise to the terrestrial vertebrates, or tetrapods. The defining feature supporting this notion is a limblike fin with supporting bones that attach to the pelvic and pectoral girdles. There are six species of lungfish (Dipnoi or Dipneusti) found in Africa, South America, and Australia. Lungfish have true lungs, which allow them to live in stagnant water. African lungfish can survive for many months in a dry lake bed, protected by a mucous cocoon.

Coelacanthus (Crossopterygii) were thought to have gone extinct 75 million years ago along with the dinosaurs until they were rediscovered near South Africa in 1938. There are two species, both large, up to 2 meters (7 feet) long, which prey on fish and squid in the deep waters of the Indian Ocean. Coelacanthus are thought to rest on their lobed fins on the ocean floor. They have apparently evolved from a shallow-water, air-breathing ancestor, but their lunglike swim bladders are now filled with fat.

Accepted for publication 15 June 2006; revised accepted 12 July 2006

With over 21,000 species distributed over the fresh and salt waters of the world, actinopterygians match the diversity of birds, mammals, reptiles, and amphibians put together. The fins of ray-finned fishes are attached to their body by fin rays, rather than lobes.

About thirty-five species are "primitive" actinopterygians. The Chondrostei have a cartilaginous skeleton and lack bony scales, and they have an asymmetrical tail like a shark's. They include the sturgeons, noted for their caviar and among the largest fishes found in freshwater, and the filter-feeding paddlefish of the Mississippi River. Gars are sit-and-wait predators restricted to the fresh- and brackish waters of North America. Gars have a cylindrical body covered with armor like
