osmoconformers - ANSWERSmarine organisms that maintain an internal environment that is osmotic to their external environment. This means that the osmotic pressure, or osmolality, of the organism's cells is equal to the osmotic pressure of their surrounding environment.

osmoregulators - ANSWERStightly regulate their body osmolality, maintaining constant internal conditions.

osmotic challenges faced by animals in freshwater environments - ANSWERS-are hypertonic to their environment. Because of their cells' higher osmotic pressure, water tends to enter their bodies.

-Consequently, they have adapted to prevent water from entering their bodies as much as possible and to eliminate the excess water that does enter.

-In addition, freshwater vertebrates tend to lose inorganic ions to their environment and so must actively transport these ions back into their bodies.

osmotic challenges faced by animals in marine environments - ANSWERS-are hypotonic to their environment; their body fluids have only about one-third the osmolality of the surrounding seawater.

-These animals are therefore in danger of losing water by osmosis, and adaptations have evolved to help them retain water to prevent dehydration. -They do this by drinking seawater and eliminating the excess ions through kidneys and gills.

osmotic challenges faced by animals in terrestrial environments - ANSWERS-The body fluids of terrestrial vertebrates clearly have a higher concentration of water than does the air surrounding them.

-they tend to lose water to the air by evaporation from the skin and lungs. All reptiles, birds, and mammals, as well as amphibians during the time when they live on land, face this problem.

-Urinary/osmoregulatory systems have evolved in these vertebrates that help them retain water.

Describe the different kinds of nitrogenous waste, their relative toxicity and solubility, and list which animals excrete each of them. - ANSWERSAmmonia, urea, and uric acid

-ammonia is the most toxic, excreted by bony fishes and amphibian tadpoles
