Activity 3: Classify each of these echidna adaptations as structural, physiological or behavioural.

- a) Echidnas have spiny needles that help protect them from predators.

When threatened or in danger, an echidna curls up

Activity 4: Read this passage on some of the adaptations of rainforest plants.

The dominant trees in a rainforest are those that are tall, allowing them to form the forest canopy and access sunlight. These trees block out the light beneath them. This has acted as a selection pressure for numerous plant species, driving the evolution of adaptations to survive and reproduce in low light. For example, rainforests have a variety of plant species that are vines or creepers that climb tall trees to access sunlight, such as the lawyer palm vine. This vine has specialised hooked spines on its branches to help attach it to other plants as it climbs upward.

The low light of the rainforest also makes it difficult for insects and other pollinators to see flowers. Pollination is important for reproduction in many plants. Hence the ability to attract pollinators has acted as a selection pressure on plants. Some rainforest plants produce large, white flowers with a strong scent to help attract pollinators, while other plants only open their flowers at night to concentrate the floral scent and attract nocturnal pollinators.

- a) Identify three examples of structural adaptations of rainforest plants from the above passage.

- b) Identify two examples of behavioural adaptations of rainforest plants from the above passage.

- c) Identify an example of a physiological adaptation of rainforest plants from the above passage.

Activity 5: Classify each of these plant adaptations as structural, physiological or behavioural.

- a) Eucalyptus trees often hang their leaves vertically, with the thin edge facing the Sun, to help manage temperature.

- b) Some plant species produce antifreeze proteins to help prevent ice crystals forming in very cold conditions.

- c) Plants in arid ecosystems often have sunken stomates, which means the stomates are on the leaf underside in small cavities. This reduces water loss via transpiration.

- d) Dandelion fluff spreads dandelion seeds effectively, as the 'fluff' from the flowers travels for kilometres in the wind.

- e) Mangrove plants are often exposed to high levels of salt. Some species can remove excess salt by allowing it to accumulate in leaves and then dropping these leaves off.
