- Blood vessel walls are three layers:
  - Tunica Intima – innermost layer, an endothelium, forms a slick, shiny surface continuous with the lining of the heart. Blood flows easily across the surface.
  - Tunica Media – middle layer, thick and composed of elastic tissue and smooth muscle.
  - Tunica Adventitia – outer layer composed of tough connective tissue.
- Arteries – walls are thick, tough, and elastic to withstand high pressure of blood pumped through them.
  - Conductance vessels – large arteries conduct blood from the heart to the arterioles.
- Arterioles – smallest arteries, composed of smooth muscle. Function is to contract and relax.
  - Resistance vessels – ability to contract and relax, to affect blood flow.
- Capillaries – thinnest walls made up of a single layer of endothelium on a delicate basement membrane. The walls allow water and dissolved substances including oxygen to move across the wall from the blood into tissue spaces.
  - Exchange vessels – ability to allow substances to move through the walls.
- Venules – capillaries converge, and the walls become thicker as the venules form larger veins.
- Capacitance vessels – veins have the ability to store blood in them.

Chapter 19.*Blood Pressure
