

Chapter 6

A protolith rock is one which preexisted and goes under a change in composition of mineral to become something new. This involves no chemical change or physical melting.

Metamorphism factors: heat and pressure

- Heat energy makes atoms vibrate more rapidly, so the chemical bonds locking atoms to their neighbors stretch and bend. If a bond stretches or bends too much, it breaks, and the atom detaches from its neighbor. The atom can then move slightly and bond to a different atom.

- Pressure increases the farther you go under earth's surface. This squeeze causes atoms to fit tighter together. Scientists use kilo bars to measure the pressure. 1 kbar = 1000 bars. At a depth of 20 km or 12 mi there is a pressure of 5.5 kbar.

- Experiments show that the specific metamorphic reactions taking place in a rock depend on both temperature and pressure.

- There are also hot water solutions called Hydrothermal Fluids and they speed up the process and also pick up and drop off different minerals as they pass through rocks. This change is called metasomatism.

Metamorphism v.s. melting

Metamorphism never involves melting. Instead it involves recrystallization. A process where the shape, size, or way minerals are held together is changed. Phase change is when the actual mineral changes yet to composition stays the same. Metamorphic reactions are when a mineral diffuses and then re-bonds into a new mineral. Pressure solution is when a mineral is covered in water and pressure causes part of the mineral to break off and be carried to somewhere else. Plastic deformation is when minerals form at a higher elevation, so they are able to grow slowly without breaking.

Metamorphic texture

The finest-grained foliated metamorphic rock, slate, forms by metamorphism of clay-rich rock when it is subjected to horizontal compression, a differential stress, at relatively low pressures and temperatures.

The next size grain is Phyllite, which is formed by metamorphism of slate.

Rock that has medium coarse grain is called Schist. There are lots of different grain sizes and textures for different minerals.
