these two sets of genetic information a seed forms a new generation. Both pollen and ovules are known genetic units that determine the expression of a hereditary trait. In all plants, two different genes are present in every cell except the gametes. The chromosomes have only one set of genes. In the human set, there are 23 pairs of chromosomes. In Cannabis, there are 10 pairs of chromosomes. Each chromosome contains hundreds of genes that influence the growth and development of the plant. If two plants with a shared genetic trait are self-pollinated or cross-pollinated, the resulting offspring will have the same trait, and all subsequent generations will exhibit the same trait. The true-breeding line of a trait is true-breeding. A strain may be true-breeding for one trait but have other characteristics. For example, the trait of being resistant to mold may be true-breeding, while being resistant to mold and having a specific trait may be a strain that is true-breeding for both traits. The gametes formed by the two identical complements of chromosomes will influence the expression of the trait. For example, a true-breeding line of a trait will breed true for the trait. Any gamete from a true-breeding line will contain the same genetic information for the trait. The gametes from one half of the genetic complement of the true-breeding line will combine to form the 2n offspring, which will be the same as the parent. That is, the offspring will be true-breeding for the trait because they have the same genes as the parent.
