ABSTRACT

This paper aims to examine empirically the mediation role of customer satisfaction between service quality, customer perceived value, corporate social responsibility, and brand loyalty at Lebanese private universities. A survey was administered with 378 respondents. A judgmental sample of university students were selected. The framework was tested through structural equation modeling (SEM). The findings indicate that service quality and perceived value influence customer satisfaction while satisfaction fully mediates the relationship between perceived value and brand loyalty. Additionally, corporate social responsibility showed insignificant relationship with customer satisfaction and brand loyalty. This study proposed that marketers should focus on service quality, customer perceived value and customer satisfaction for increasing brand loyalty in adopting their strategies at Lebanese private universities.

1. Introduction

Nowadays, to compete in the highly dynamic and complex environment conditions, corporations need reliable returns on their loyalty. Subsequently, brand loyalty is considered as an essential for corporation's manageability (Chaudhary & Holbrook, 2001). Given that loyalty to the university is driven by the general degree of customer satisfaction (Brown & Mazur, 2009) it is imperative to recognize the consequences and their variable influence on satisfaction. Specialists embraced an entrenched expectation-confirmation paradigm, utilized broadly in the service quality literature. Students ability to keep up a relationship with their university is dependent upon their view of the advantages of fulfillment and high relationship quality that give a consistent progression of significant worth (Parasuraman et al., 1993). According to previous studies, service quality can be viewed as a direct factor that impact satisfaction and loyalty (Brady et al., 2002; Chu et al., 2012). On the off chance that these relationships are validated, administrators can comprehend the wellspring of both satisfaction and loyalty more obviously to give better support to customers and improve the corporation profitability. Until this point, corporate social responsibility (CSR) has fundamentally been treated as a corporate issue. Most of the research regarding this matter takes a management viewpoint. It argues how enterprises will best react to specific requests of generally external partners, which corporate social responsibility activities improve organization loyalty, and what spurs them to get occupied with CSR (Bawa, 2008). However, there are some unexplored inquiries in previous studies. To start with, there is an absence of exploration on illustrating the unpredictable influence of CSR on brand loyalty. For instance, Werder and Chandler (2005) found that CSR had a direct influence on brand loyalty. While Salmons et al. (2005) stated that there is no direct relationship between social responsibility and brand loyalty towards an organization. In consumer behaviour literature, the role of CSR was unpredictable than previously conceptualized direct relationship (Elein & Dawar, 2004). Plus, CSR has variety of measurements, it is essential to analyze each measure of CSR to know how it is really seen by consumers (Maignan & Ferrell, 2001). Customer
