PART 1:

4. A voltage-gated sodium ion channel is a channel that allows only sodium ions to pass through. The function of a voltage-gated sodium ion channel is that they open and close as a response to changes in the membrane. They are made from proteins.

5. Sodium ions need channels in order to move into and out of cells because sodium cannot cross the cell membrane by simple diffusion. A cell membrane is selectively permeable and also sodium ions are positively charged.

6. Sodium ions can only pass through specific channels in the hydrophobic barriers that are located in the cell membrane. Channels are needed rather than simple diffusion because if sodium ions were to be able to go in and out of a cell casually then the cell could become toxic. Channels open and close depending on if there is stimulation that occurs.

7. When a neuron is not sending any signals, it is in rest. When the neuron is at rest, potassium ions can cross through the membrane, while chloride and sodium ions are not as permeable. The sodium/potassium pump creates the ion concentration gradient by moving three sodium ions out of the cell while moving two potassium ions into the cell against the concentration gradient. This causes sodium ions to accumulate outside the cell making the inside of the cell more negative. This difference in ion concentration creates the membrane potential.

8. When a nerve impulse is received, it causes the electrical membrane potential to jump to -50 's mV. This jump to threshold is the generation of an action potential. The action potential is an electrical signal generated by neurons. AP's are used for long distance communications.

9. The generation of an action potential causes voltage-gated sodium channels to open. As sodium ions re-enter the cell it causes an even greater positive jump in membrane potential and results in the propagation of the action potential.

10. Tetrodotoxin blocks voltage-gated sodium ion channels. If a neuron were to be exposed to tetrodotoxin, the sodium ion channels would not open when a nerve impulse is received that
