

Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice

This document is a printable version of the introductory guide on the Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice topic page of the Targeting Natural Resource Corruption (TNRC) Knowledge Hub. It outlines the impact of corruption in law enforcement or the criminal justice system on conservation goals and approaches that can help conservation and natural resource management practitioners to strengthen their programming and related responses.

Contents

1. How enforcement supports conservation objectives	2
2. Applying a corruption lens to conservation enforcement	3
1. Anti-corruption and law enforcement: What can practitioners do?	4
1.1 Supporting enforcement agencies	4
1.2 Fostering transparency, accountability, and monitoring	5
1.3 Leveraging technologies	6
1.4 Exploring whistleblowing and other reporting options	6
1.5 Engaging the private sector	7

Key takeaways

- Law enforcement and the wider criminal justice system – here covering efforts to deter, detect, investigate, prosecute, and sanction violations of laws and regulations – are essential to address both illegal activities that undermine conservation objectives and the corruption that facilitates those activities.
- Crimes and corruption involving wildlife, forests, and fisheries are not “victimless,” and detecting and deterring them should be prioritized. In addition, effective enforcement of laws helps create an environment of stability and trust. This in turn reinforces adherence to laws and regulations that govern natural resources and their use.
- Practitioners can play an important role in promoting effective law enforcement to address crime and corruption in support of conservation objectives. Options range from working directly with partner agencies and institutions to strengthen their resilience to corruption, to working with other stakeholders to strengthen wider enabling conditions.
- However, corruption can undermine law enforcement, rendering it ineffective or even harmful. Applying a “corruption lens” can help shape better and safer strategies for working with law enforcement. Strategic decisions about whether and how to support law enforcement in a particular context therefore require a strong understanding of local actors, power dynamics, legal and institutional frameworks, and the underlying drivers and facilitators of corruption.
