Introduction

Reconciling the needs of victims and offenders with the needs of the community is the underlying goal of restorative justice. Unlike retributive justice, which is primarily concerned with punishing crime, restorative justice focuses on repairing the injury that crime inflicts. As a means to that end, restorative conferencing brings together victims, offenders, and other members of the community to hold offenders accountable not only for their crimes but for the harm they cause to victims. Then models of restorative conferencing include reparation, victim-offender mediation, family group conferencing, and circle sentencing. These models and the traditional sentencing processes such as retribution, deterrence, rehabilitation and incapacitation will be addressed. If restorative justice is to succeed in contributing to the systematic reform of our juvenile justice system, it must embody new values that reflect the needs of victims, offenders, and communities. The models described previously embody these values and provide tools for communities engaged in implementing restorative justice throughout this paper.

Concept & History of Restorative Justice

The definition which has come closest to general acceptance is one offered by Marshall "Restorative justice is a process whereby all the parties with a stake in a particular offence come together to resolve collectively how to deal with the aftermath of the offence and its implications for the future"¹. Overall restorative justice deals with repairing the harm (often known as conferencing) and its approaches seem to have three major characteristics that distinguish them from traditional court based approaches. These are, a greater emphasis on the role and experience of victims, lay and legal actors having decision-making authority, and a setting where there is more interaction and discussion between all parties involved.²

In essence, the idea of restorative justice is to create an opportunity for the "families of care" of both offenders and victims to explore the impact that offending
