Principle of Comparative Politics (Ch. 2)

- What is science?
 - It's not facts and not a body of knowledge
 - science is a method for discovering truth
 - relies on criticism and requires allowing for the possibility that our theories and claims are wrong
 - Falsifiability is the thing that distinguishes science from nonscience.
 - Scientific statements must be falsifiable
 - all scientific statements must be potentially testable
 - There can be an observation that falsifies or refute our theory
 - Non-falsifiable statement
 - Tautologies: a statement that is true by definition
 - Ex: "strong states are able to implement policies"
 - If we define "strong states" as states that successfully implement policies, then this statement is tautologies.

Statements about unobservable phenomena

- this doesn't mean that non science is nonsense

Scientific method

describes the process by which scientists learn about the world

- 1. Question
- 2. Theory
- 3. Implications (hypothesis)
- 4. Observation (test hypothesis)
- 5. Evaluation

Theory

a set of logically consistent statements that tell us why these things we observe occur a "model", informal or formal, very simplified

Theory construction

- Consider the puzzle... Who? What? Why?

Hypotheses

The expectations to be next deduce implications from the model other than those we set out to explain in the first place

Empirical Observation

Test our claims, examine the model's implications of the model are consistent with what we observe in the world around us "difficult tests" or "critical tests"

Evaluation

If we observe those things implied by our theory , then we say that our theory is supported

We do not say that our theory is proven

We look for evidence that will falsify our theory

If we fail to observe the expected implications then our theory is probably wrong and goes back to reconstructing your theory.
