

Dissociation Treatment Guidelines

Dissociative disorders encompass a range of symptoms and behaviors that result from a disruption in the normal, integrative functions of consciousness, memory, identity, and perception.

- Dissociative identity disorder (DID): Characterized by the presence of two or more distinct personality states or identities that recurrently take control of behavior, accompanied by an inability to recall important personal information.
 - Dissociative amnesia: Marked by gaps in memory for personal information beyond what can be explained by ordinary forgetfulness.
 - Depersonalization/derealization disorder: Involves an ongoing or recurrent experience of feeling detached from one's body or thoughts (depersonalization) and/or a sense of unreality of one's surroundings (derealization).

Treatment options for DID

Psychotherapy

The cornerstone of treatment, ideally involving a phased approach:

- Phase 1: stabilization—focus on safety, symptom reduction, and developing coping strategies.
- Phase 2: trauma processing—addressing the traumatic roots of dissociation through approaches like trauma-focused cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT) or eye movement desensitization and reprocessing (EMDR).
- Phase 3: integration and rehabilitation—working towards a coherent sense of self and improving relational and functional capacities.

Supportive care

This includes educating the patient and family about the disorder, enhancing social support, and managing day-to-day stress.

Pharmacotherapy

No medication is approved specifically for DID, but adjunctive use can help manage comorbid conditions such as depression, anxiety, or post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) symptoms.

Hypnosis and identity access

Hypnosis may facilitate access to different identity states, allowing for improved communication, stabilization, and interpretation. Some therapists actively engage and interact with these identities to encourage integration, helping the patient move toward a unified self.
