

I. Accounting – The Language of Business

1.1 Objectives

At the end of the lesson, the student should be able to:

- Distinguish the nature, functions, and objectives of accounting
- Determine the scope and branches of accounting
- Recognize the users of accounting information and their information needs

Need for Accounting

In business, several parties are interested to its records to seek answer to their questions and bases for their decisions. These parties can be classified into direct users or those who have direct interest to business records and indirect users or those who are indirectly interested to the accounting information of the business. Among the direct users are the following:

1. Owner. He is interested to know whether the business should be maintained, increased, decreased, or disposed of completely. Further, he is interested to know whether he is getting a fair return of his investment.
2. Management. To the management, financial information serves as a measure for making future financial decisions and a measure of its effectiveness.
3. Prospective Investors. An investor is interested in the financial statement to determine whether to acquire ownership in the firm.
4. Creditors. Creditors use financial statements as a basis to answer such question
5. Employees. Employees are interested in information to enable them to assess the ability of the firm to provide remuneration and other benefits.
6. Government. The government needs accounting information to regulate the firm's activities and determine the basis for taxation policies.

Why study Accounting

In order to appreciate and understand the financial reports of the business, one should have an understanding of how data are gathered and recorded. All these
