Question	What constitutes a business as a company to take legal decisions?
Answer	A company is a legal entity that is created by the incorporation of a group of individuals, known as shareholders or members, into a single legal entity. The company is then registered with the relevant government authorities and is given a separate legal identity from its members. The company is then able to enter into legal contracts, own property, and sue or be sued in its own name. This means that the company is treated as a separate legal entity from its members, and the members are not personally liable for the company's debts or obligations. The company is also able to raise capital by issuing shares or bonds, and it can enter into legal agreements with other companies or individuals. This makes the company a powerful legal entity that can operate independently of its members.
Question	How do you define a company's legal status and its relationship to its members and creditors?
Answer	A company's legal status is defined by its incorporation and its registration with the relevant government authorities. This gives the company a separate legal identity from its members, and it allows the company to enter into legal contracts, own property, and sue or be sued in its own name. The company's relationship to its members is defined by its articles of association and its memorandum of association. These documents set out the rules that govern the company's internal affairs, including the rights and responsibilities of its members. The company's relationship to its creditors is defined by its debts and obligations. The company is responsible for repaying its debts, and its creditors have the right to sue the company for non-payment.
