

CHAPTER 1: THE HISTORY OF MARRIAGE AND FAMILY THERAPY

The field of marriage and family therapy (MFT) evolved with changing social dynamics, particularly after World War II. At that time, families began to experience greater interpersonal tension as roles became less predictable and options for individuals increased. Divorce rates rose, and as the world entered the atomic age, anxiety reached levels that made it difficult for the family as a system to cope (Goldenberg & Goldenberg, 1991).

People also became more attuned to family problems and more accepting of professional intervention. Some clinicians began to think that individual psychological problems would be better understood and resolved within the context of the family.

Goldenberg & Goldenberg (1991) identified five factors that contributed to the evolution of family therapy:

1. The extension of psychological treatment to the full range of emotional problems, eventually including work with whole families.
2. The introduction of general systems theory, with its emphasis on exploring relationships among the parts that make up an interrelated whole.
3. The investigation of the family's role in the development of schizophrenia in one of its members.
4. The development of the fields of child guidance and marital counseling.
5. The increased interest in clinical techniques such as group therapy.

Nichols and Schwartz (1998) attribute the growth of family therapy models to "clinical and research developments in hospital psychiatry, group dynamics, interpersonal psychiatry, the child guidance movement, research on schizophrenia, and marriage counseling" (p. 37). Prior to these developments, psychoanalytic theory dominated the field of psychology, but clinicians began to break away from this model as they discovered the powerful influence of the family on treatment outcome and identified problems that seemed more likely to be resolved by treating the whole family.

THE EARLY YEARS: THE 1940s, 1950s, AND 1960s

HISTORICAL INFLUENCES

Reaction to Psychoanalytic Theory. The practice of psychoanalysis was founded on Freud's theory about the individual as he/she negotiated the stages of psychosexual development. The theory, though focused on the individual, does acknowledge the importance of the family. For example, in a now famous case, Freud explained that the horse phobia of "Little Hans" stemmed from the boy's fear of his father's retribution as a result of Hans's affection for his mother. Nevertheless, Freud's therapy was limited to
