

Theories in Popular Culture

Theory

- a plausible or scientifically acceptable general principle or body of principles offered to explain phenomena.
- A belief, policy, or procedure proposed or followed as the basis of action.
- a hypothesis assumed for the sake of argument or investigation.

Theory of culture - the study of relationships between elements in a whole way of life.

Culturalism

The analysis of culture is the attempt to discover the nature of the organization which is the complex of these relationships. Analysis of specific works or institutions is, in this context, analysis of their essential kind of organization, the relationships which works, or institutions embody as parts of the organization as a whole.

The "complex organization" of culture as a particular way of life, the purpose of cultural analysis is always to understand what a culture is expressing: "the actual experience through which a culture was lived"; the "important common element"; "a particular community of experience." — Williams calls "the structure of feeling." By structure of feeling, it means the shared values of a specific group, class, or society.

Culture always exists on three levels:

1. There is the lived culture of a specific time and place, only fully accessible to those living in that time and place.
2. There is the recorded culture, of every kind, from art to the most everyday facts: the culture of a period.
3. There is also, as the factor connecting lived culture and period cultures, the culture of the selective tradition.

Lived culture is culture as lived and experienced by people in their day-to-day existence in a particular place and at a particular moment in time: the only people who have full access to this culture are those who actually lived its structure of feeling.

Cultural analysis has access only through the documentary record of the culture. But the documentary record itself fragments under the processes of "the selective tradition".

MARXISM

It is a body of revolutionary theory with the purpose of changing the world. Marxism insists that all are ultimately political. The Marxist approach to culture insists that texts and practices must be analyzed in relation to their historical conditions of production (and in some versions, the changing conditions of their consumption and reception).

Marx argues that each significant period in history is constructed around a particular "mode of production": that is, the way in which a society is organized (i.e. slave, feudal, capitalist) to produce the material necessities of life — food, shelter, etc. specific ways of obtaining the necessities of life.

Marx (1976a). "The mode of production of material life conditions the social, political and intellectual life process in general."

Products of Modes of Production:

- | | |
|-------|--|
| (i) | specific ways of obtaining the necessities of life |
| (ii) | (a) specific social relationships between workers and those who control the mode of production, and |
| (iii) | (b) specific social institutions (including cultural ones). At the heart of this analysis is the claim that how a society produces its means of existence (its particular "mode of production") ultimately determines the political, social, and cultural shape of that society and its possible future development. |

A classical Marxist approach to popular culture would above all else insist that to understand and explain a text or practice it must always be situated in its historical moment of production, analyzed in terms of the historical conditions that produced it. There are dangers here: historical conditions are reduced to the mode of production and the superstructure becomes a passive reflection of the base.

Culture Industry

Authentic culture has taken over the utopian function of religion: to keep alive the human desire for a better world beyond the confines of the present. (Horkheimer 1978)

Theodor Adorno (1991) and Max Horkheimer (1978) coined the term "culture industry" to designate the products and processes of mass culture.

Theodore Adorno and Max Horkheimer coined the term culture industry to designate the products and processes of mass culture.

Two features of culture industry:

homogeneity - "film, radio and magazines make up a system which is uniform as a whole and in every part . . . all mass culture is identical"

predictability -
