

HEREDITY PREDICTION ANALYSIS

Constructing and analyzing pedigrees from breeding and family data. When constructing a pedigree from data of families, breeders should distinguish between affected individuals that are mating and those that are nonreproductive. Pedigrees are most often used by genetic researchers to identify causes for genetic disorders. However, breeders do so for different reasons. Breeders require pedigree information to select breeding animals for their ability to produce offspring having the desired characteristics and to estimate the risk of undesirable outcomes.

- Breeder's numbers represent generations
- Roman numerals represent individuals in the pedigree from left to right
- Roman numerals for identifying animals past 10-25
- Roman numerals for siblings of other animals

Remember: symbols represent an animal or type (sex) of pedigree that carries the genetic information that is being studied.

1. Show the pedigree information (symbols) for the first generation only.
2. Show a circle for the pedigree information. The female is always the first.
3. Show the second affected individuals or not the second affected with a plus sign.

Remember: When a pedigree is shown the pedigree should be interpreted as a family. It is not possible to identify an individual's pedigree as a family. It is not possible to identify an individual's pedigree as a family.
