Consumers' Use of Nutrition Information When Eating Out Christian A. Gregory,Ilya Rahkovsky,Tobenna D. Anekwe,2014-09-27 One strategy for helping Americans improve their diets is to make nutrition information more widely available A practical problem for this strategy has been the recent increase in household reliance on food away from home FAFH this food has not on the whole been subject to the same nutrition labeling requirements as food items sold to be prepared and eaten at home FAH In response to this problem the 2010 Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act requires all restaurants with 20 or more locations to provide nutrition information on menus Given these upcoming changes it would be helpful to know who already uses nutrition information that eating establishments provide voluntarily and who might use such information when it becomes widely available because of the new regulations What are the demographic and diet related characteristics of those who already use nutrition information when eating out and those who say they would use such information if it were available Would more nutrition information in FAFH settings prompt the average consumer to make better choices Consumers' Use of Nutrition Information When Eating Out United States Department of Agriculture,2014-12-09 Until recently many restaurants and fast food places did not offer nutrition information at the point of purchase This is expected to change because the 2010 Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act requires that nutrition information be posted in many of these venues Once the law is fully implemented it will be important to understand how it has affected consumer behavior To establish a baseline against which to measure changes in the use of onsite nutrition information about food away from home FAFH we examine the demographic characteristics and dietary behaviors of U S consumers of FAFH before passage of the law based on responses to the 2007 08 and 2009 10 National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey NHANES In particular we examine the characteristics of consumers who use nutrition information and of those who express interest in using the information when they eat out in the future The Oxford Handbook of the Economics of Food Consumption and Policy Jayson L.
